Ms. Salma Heni, 24, Tunisia

Salma Heni is a Tunisian private-law researcher interested in the intersection of law, institutional accountability, and international governance. Through her research with the ALECSO Chair for International Commercial Arbitration, her work on sanctions and arbitral enforcement, and her wins in legal advocacy and moot court competitions, she has explored how legal frameworks can strengthen accountability and constrain abuses of power. A recipient of the Vreede Scholarship to attend The Hague Academy of International Law's Summer Course on Private International Law, she has also been admitted to the International Anti-Corruption Academy's Visiting Professional Programme in Austria. She believes corruption erodes public trust and equal opportunity, and that young people must be empowered not only to challenge misconduct, but to understand institutions and help make them more transparent, accountable, and inclusive.
